2008-03458/

www.london.ca

Home > City Hall > Newsroom

The Corporation of The City of London
April 2, 2008

Riverbanks and water levels remain high

Water levels remain high in local rivers and creeks and are expected to stay that way for at least another couple of days.

A quick spring melt of accumulated snow, along with yesterday's rain, has caused water and creek beds in our area to swell - leading to dangerous conditions. And while for some fast moving water and high levels are an enticing sight, City staff caution pedestrians to stay away from these areas. Parents are reminded to advise children not to play near riverbanks or in water flooded areas.

Although the water is not expected to advance further in the next 24-48 hours, nor do we expect it to recede. The Upper Thames River Conservation Authority is regulating flows in anticipation of rain forecast for the end of the week. City staff are continuing to monitor the situation closely and customer service representatives are also available to answer any water related questions residents may have by calling 519 661-4570.